MARKET COMMENTS

October was a month of sharp contrasts. The fall in global equities concealed a clear shift beneath the surface: investors were rethinking the price of AI-led growth, not abandoning equities altogether. The contrast in the US was telling. The S&P 500 fell 2.6% in US dollars, while the equal-weighted index rose 2.9%, with more than 70% of its companies ending the month higher. Weakness in the largest technology stocks obscured gains across much of the wider market.

That shift in leadership was also visible across regions. UK equities rose 1.5% in sterling, supported by energy and defensive sectors, while Asia ex Japan fell 9.0%, where technology and semiconductor exposure left markets more vulnerable to doubts about AI spending and Chinese competition. Investors continued to recognise the growth opportunity, but became more demanding about how quickly investment could translate into earnings.

The search for quality extended to bonds. UK gilts gained 1.6%, while global high-yield bonds fell 0.2% as investors favoured stronger credit quality. Gold also declined 7.4%, despite geopolitical uncertainty, while high-quality government bonds rallied. October's message was not simply that investors turned cautious; it was that returns increasingly depended on what they owned. Broad exposure and reliable cash flows mattered more than a single growth theme or traditional safe haven.
